Award Activity

This grant provides scholars with the opportunity to conduct research and teach at the Universidad de la Laguna. Candidates are expected to dedicate approximately 50% of their time to research and 50% of their time to teaching.

Research:

Priority will be given to experts in the field of North American history, specifically the relationship between the Canary Islands and the Caribbean. Projects which contribute to research already being carried out by ULL research groups are encouraged.

Publications by ULL professors in the field of North American History can be viewed at:
- https://ull.academia.edu/ManuelDEPAZ [3]

The Scholar will be invited to present his/her research in seminars and to attend research seminars led by ULL’s professors. There will be ample opportunities for research collaboration.

Teaching at the undergraduate level:

The visiting professor will teach a maximum of two courses. Each course consists of 42-45 teaching hours in the classroom, divided between lectures and discussion. Depending on the visiting professor’s expertise, there is also the possibility of teaching complete courses or co-teaching parts of one or more courses. Specific teaching assignments will be established once the applicant proposes what he/she would like to teach. All courses will be taught in English.

The courses taught in the undergraduate history degree (equivalent to Bachelor's degree) can be viewed here:

Additional Comments
The Universidad de La Laguna (ULL) is the oldest institution of higher education learning in the Canary Islands, and it is possible to trace its history back more than 200 years.
Two hundred years after it was founded, the Universidad de La Laguna continues to be a beacon for society in the Canary Islands that, using the Atlantic as a bridge, has stretched out its hand to the rest of the world.

Currently, this public institution is home to more than 25,000 individuals who are either students, academic or research staff, or administrative staff and service personnel.

The university’s course catalogue includes: 45 undergraduate degrees; 21 official graduate courses in the process of being phased out and 30 official master’s degree programs; 52 doctoral programs; and 25 master’s degree programs unique to this university.

The geographical position of Canary Islands in the Atlantic region places them between three continents, which means that, from a strategic point of view, the universities located on the islands are well placed to become important hubs of reference and flagships of knowledge and learning in the Atlantic.
